THE SHOEMAKER'S DAUGHTER.

BY H. GARDINER.

[conclusion,] They entered the ante-chamber, ocspied by officers of various grades, sevral of whom rose from cards, or smoking on benches to greet them. A young man, an aid-de-camp, respectfully addressed them, and inquired their business. M. Mayer again produced his letter. The officer bowed profoundly, and said he was at their service. Moy ing through the crowd of officers, he led them by a staircase upward, until he reached a large open landing. He tapped gently twice, and the door opened. A servant in rich livery appeared, who made way for the party, and passing on, with the theater of the palace to their right, they turned round and entered the right, they turned round and entered the real Palace of the Tuileries; of which they had hitherto only visited the wing.

Presently the aid-de-camp paused.

"Monsieur will be kind enough to wait one moment," he said, as they entered an ante-chamber. "I will precede you, and return in an instant."

"Where are we going?" asked Katerina, of her father, in a whisper.
"I don't know, but my head begins to grow dizzy; I begin to suspect that we must give way to circumstances."
"Never!" exclaimed the young girl firmly. "Will you walk in ?" said the aid de camp, returning, and standing with the M. Mayer and Katerina obeyed me-chanically. They advanced with eyes dimmed by excitement, with a singing in their ears, with a fainting in the heart—a doubt—a fear—a dread—that left them, a minute later, standing in Thihet. "Well, Monsieur Mayer," said s omewhat gentle voice. M. Mayer and Kaerina now saw that they were in the famous private cabinet of the Emperor Napoleon — who had just been crowned — with its rich ornahaughtiness, pride, and a spirit of insolent domineering.

"His Majesty, the Emperor," cried M. Mayer to his daughter, bowing as if he were very much inclined to kneel; while Katerina stood erect, respectful but firm, and resolved to oppose even

"I am informed, M. Mayer, that your daughter has refused the hand of one of my bravest officers, Colonel Peterman Now, as all my subjects are my children I have sent for you to ask an explana ion. It seems inconceivable to me that a daughter of a tradesman should refuse the hand of a distinguished officer who may become a marshal."

"Please your Imperial Majesty," said Katerina, firmly, and without note of hesitation in her voice, "it is not the daughter of the obscure shoemaker who refuses the hand of Colonel Peterman, but the poetess Glelia." "Oh!" exclaimed Napoleon, a flush of pleasure crossing his cheeks for a a poem on his campaign had deeply provoking smile. "With the dead," replied Katerina sadly. "Explain yourself." Katerina thought a moment, and then briefly told the story of the past—of Paul, of his departure, of the boots. "The Commander-in-Chief, of th army of Paris," said an usher, as the girl finished her story.

Katerina turned round just in time to Napoleon took up a letter, turned his back on them, with a grim smile, as if he thought them childish, and yet had no objection to let them have time to express their feelings. Paul drew the shoemaker and his daughter into the embrasure of the window, and rapidly explained himself. He had never for gotten them; had always intended to write, but had put it off-taken up as he was by his military duties. He had only been three weeks in Paris as commander-in-chief. A few evenings back ne saw a lovely woman at a ball; asked who she was; heard that it was Madameoiselle Mayer; the "intended" of this Colonel Peterham; and angry, he knew not why, at this, he avoided being lect your duty." Paul, Katerina and Mayer went out after again expressing their thanks, and adjourned to the apartments of the Commander in-Chief, where, again, at full length, and over a dinner, they talked over the past. Mayer was lost in ecstacies at having furnished the fature Emperor and his friend, on credit, with boots; but this delight was a dittle abated when Paul insisted on Mayer on the epoch of his marriage with Katerina, shutting up shop and retiring from business. The good German grumbled excessively; but a smile from Katerina soon set aside all his scruples, while the old man himself smiled grimly at a thought which illuminated his brain

A month later, Napoleon being about to leave Paris, the marriage took place. and Katerina became a Generalla wifele Paul a thorough soldier s braye and noble: character-rose din his oprofes sion even higher, and proved a good husband and an excellent father. Neither he nor his wife ever changed their principles, serving Napoleon only from the conviction that, after the Revolution and the Coalition his reign was indispensa-ble. When he died, they remained faithful to his memory, and refused to A few months after the marriage of Paul and Katerina, the grim smile of Mayer was explained. The ex-shoemaker had retired from business, as bepromised, and had purchased a cottage; on the road to St. Cloud. One day Paul and Katerina, in an open carriage, with the Emperor and the Empress Josephine, stopped to speak with him a moment, as he stood smoking his pipe on a little eminence overlooking the road. Paul and Katerina blushed up to the eyes, and looked confounded and confused, but both Napoleon and Jose phine laughed heartily.

On a large brass plate on the doors was engraved: "Leopold Mayer, later Shoemaker to His Majesty the Emperor.
